

Wedding Dress choices, to buy or not to buy, that is the question.

A survey from a leading website shows differences in opinions regarding the issue of buying or hiring a wedding dress.

Wedding days are a joyous occasion, with the celebration of the communion of two people joining in matrimony. The big day does, however come with a price tag and many are reviewing their options in the current economic climate with figures showing that weddings can be costly, this is not entirely unexpected. One of the most important elements of a wedding for the bride is the wedding dress, and as such this can take up a great deal of the wedding budget on its own, however one option is to hire a wedding dress.

A recent survey on leading website www.weddingchaos.co.uk, has thrown up some interesting results. Its poll, taken from its members, shows the overwhelming majority would not hire a wedding dress. In fact more than double the figure who said they would.

This highlights an interesting trend, as exposed by this survey and comments on the corresponding forum suggest that many brides would rather delay their wedding until they could afford to buy their own wedding dress. The interesting part of the survey, was the fact that many of those who had already paid for their wedding dress and were married, felt that they may have taken the option of hiring rather than buying, due to the fact that the dress was now no longer required and simply stored in the loft.

With the economy in recession, the facts are that many will be looking to reduce the costs of their wedding day, as there are so many factors to consider when organising a wedding such as wedding cars, photo's etc, cost savings can be made. Although the decision may not be a pleasant one, this survey shows that the experiences and thoughts of this emotive topic differ pre or post wedding day.
